Overview of Migration

Migrant labour has played a significant role in Singapore’s economic development since the city-state’s industrialisation in the 1980s. Although initially conceived as a temporary solution to labour shortages, migrant workers have become a distinctive feature of the city-state’s workforce. In 2013, approximately 2,323,000 migrants comprised 42.9% of Singapore’s total population.

Within public discourse, a distinction is frequently made between “foreign workers” and “foreign talent” – referring respectively to semi-skilled and skilled professionals. Different immigration programs apply to the two classes of workers; while skilled workers and professionals are encouraged to seek permanent residency and citizenship through liberal policies, low-skilled migrant workers are often considered a “transient” population and are correspondingly subjected to stricter controls.

Relevant Policies

Skilled Workers/ Professionals

A competitive hub of international financial activity, a number of policies and schemes aim to incentivise the migration of professional and skilled workers to Singapore. Some of these include:

2. Singapore Talent Recruitment (“STAR”) Committee: Established in 1998, the “STAR” Committee similarly aims to attract foreign talent and investment to Singapore, through the implementation of programs such as the “Global Investment Program”.

3. International Manpower Program: The Economic Development Board’s International Manpower Program provides information concerning employers, industry profiles and immigration to prospective professionals.

Professionals and skilled workers, unlike unskilled workers, do not require a work permit to work in Singapore, but hold an Employment Pass (EP) or a Special Pass (S Pass) depending on basic salary and level of education received. In 2007, the Personalised Employment Pass (PEP) was introduced for all EP holders and overseas professionals who fulfilled the relevant criteria with regards to salary. Compared to holders of work permits (below), holders of the EP or the S Pass enjoy greater benefits within Singaporean society. Entitlement to apply for permanent residency and citizenship opens the doors of varying eligibility to categories of housing rental and purchase, maternity and childcare benefits, tax relief benefits, and a social security plan.

Recent years have seen local complaints that foreign professionals are preferred for employment over local Singaporeans. To assuage such concerns, the Singaporean government instituted the Fair Consideration Framework in 2014, requiring employers to hire expatriate workers only where no suitable Singaporean candidate has applied within two weeks of the job listing.

Unskilled / Semi-Skilled Workers

A different set of policies is operated with regards to unskilled and semi-skilled migrant workers, who are not entitled to the Employment Pass or the Special Pass.

Work Permit System

Migrant workers from "source countries" (with which Singapore has agreements) working within the construction, manufacturing, marine, process or services sector require a work permit (WP) to work in Singapore. The permit is not directly obtained by the migrant worker, but also applied for by his employer or other employment agent. The permit is valid for up to two years with the possibility of renewal, depending on the employment period, worker's passport and security bonds.

Migrant workers holding a work permit are excluded under the jurisdiction of the Employment Act and Work Compensation Act; instead, their employment is governed by the Employment of Foreign Manpower Act (Cap 91A) and Employment of Foreign Manpower (Work Passes) Regulations 2012 ("Regulations"). Depending on the occupation specified on the work permit – for example, that of "domestic worker", "construction worker" or other – different being and regulatory conditions apply as specified in the Regulations. Such conditions typically include insurance coverage by the employer (as work permit holders are not protected by workman’s compensation), medical examination requirements; in the case of domestic workers, there are conditions relating to accommodation and maintenance.

Migrant workers holding a work permit are subject to stringent stay conditions; they are permitted only to work within the industry and for their employer stipulated on their permit. Termination of employment of a migrant worker results in the cancellation of their work permit, without which they must leave Singapore within 7 days. Repatriation may occur on any breach of condition or stay or of contract; for example, due to pregnancy for female migrants or failure to seek approval from the controller of work permits in marrying Singaporean citizens or permanent residents.

Further, effective from 1 September 2012, migrant workers must earn at least S$4,000 (USD$3,150) a month in order to sponsor their dependents’ stay in Singapore. Effectively, this means that most low-skilled workers are not able to bring their family to the city-state.

Dependency Ceiling / Foreign-worker Levy

Employers of semi-skilled or unskilled migrants are subject to “dependency ceilings”, a form of quota in which the ratio of migrant workers to the employer's total workforce may not exceed a certain “ceiling”. The dependency ceiling varies according to sector; for example, it is currently 87.5% for the construction industry, compared to 40% in the service industry.

Employers are also required to pay a “foreign worker levy” in respect of semi-skilled and unskilled migrant workers hired, depending on the worker qualifications and dependency ratio within the company. Failure to pay the levy may incur penalties or cancellation of work permits. In recent years, the dependency ceiling has been lowered, and levies increased in response to concerns of job displacement by migrant workers affecting local Singaporeans.

Under the Employment Agencies Rules 2011, employment agencies may charge migrant workers no more than the sum of one month’s salary per year of their contract. In the case of employers unilaterally terminating a worker’s contract within the first six months of his or her contract, the agency is liable to refund 50% of the collected fees within seven working days of the termination. However, many Singaporean agencies charge in excess of the statutory limit due to ineffective enforcement of the rules by the Ministry of Manpower, such that unskilled and semi-skilled workers are placed into situations of debt bondage. The Employment Agencies Rules 2011 regulate only the charging of fees from workers by employment agencies, failing to oversee or control commonplace indirect means of charging fees such as through third-party loans or by employers. The absence of written statements or evidence relating to fees charged by employment agencies exacerbates overcharging issues, due to a lack of tangible evidence. Other common agency malpractices include passport confiscation; while the Rules stipulate that the documents of a “foreign employee” must be returned “as soon as practicable” upon employment, a “reasonable excuse” allows agencies to limit the movement of their workers.

Further, the fee cap notably applies only to employment agencies within Singapore; it does not cover other fees charged by overseas partner agencies, or expenses for training and medical examinations incurred before deployment. This leaves unskilled and semi-skilled workers – notably, domestic workers – vulnerable to exorbitant sums incurred even before arrival in Singapore. In 2010, a spokesman of the Ministry of Manpower stated that overpayment by migrant workers within their countries of origin is “beyond the jurisdiction” of the Singapore government.

In 2014, a new pre-departure video detailing information relating to workers’ rights and entitlements, common recruitment malpractices, and behavioural advice was produced jointly by the Ministry of Manpower and the Migrant Workers’ Centre. The Migrant Workers’ Centre stated that the video would be broadcast to migrants before departure from their country of origin, in their native language.

Low Wages and Poor Living Conditions

Although Singapore has not instituted minimum wage standards, significant wage discrimination is apparent when comparing local and migrant workers. In their submission to the 24th Session of the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), a joint submission by the Humanitarian Organization for Migrant Economics (HOME) and Think Centre stated that low-wage migrant workers in all sectors of the economy are paid less than local workers.\(^{48}\) Such concerns over wage discrimination, by which Singaporean and Malaysian bus drivers were paid more, motivated a strike by Chinese bus drivers in 2011.\(^{49}\)

Whilst employers are required to provide accommodation to their migrant workers, it was reported by HOME that many, particularly construction workers, are accommodated in overcrowded, unhygienic and poorly ventilated dormitories.\(^{50}\) Such provisions mean that workers are denied privacy and decent living conditions. Although Singapore’s Parliament passed the Foreign Employee Dormitories Bill in early 2015 requiring that all dormitories with capacities of over 1,000 be licenced and adhere to designated standards (such as the inclusion of quarantine plans and recreational areas), it has been criticised for applying only to large migrant worker dormitories.\(^{51}\)

Access to Justice

While migrant workers have access to legal channels for any grievances against employers, in practice, their ability to make effective use of the system is hindered by patchy enforcement of court orders.\(^{52}\) Indeed, many workers who bring claims against their employers are subjected to forced repatriation.\(^{53}\) Although the Employment of Foreign Manpower Act stipulates that employers are responsible for providing accommodation and food to workers during the filing of a complaint – which is reported by HOME to take as long as two years – workers may be pressured or even evicted.\(^{54}\) Even where migrant workers have sufficient evidence to file a claim against their employer or company, long investigation times mean that workers may not return to their country of origin in several years, nor are they necessarily compensated.\(^{55}\) This, coupled with the fact that migrant workers are frequently the weaker party in terms of finances, creates a significant disincentive for migrant workers to make complaints. Indeed, 29 migrant worker participants of the 2011 bus driver strikes were deported following the event.\(^{56}\)

Discrimination

Although the Singaporean government has made concerted efforts to encourage acceptance of migrant workers and to honour their contribution to the city-state’s economy, migrant workers reportedly still face private discrimination from other sectors of society. Although migrant workers are legally permitted to unionise, they are frequently unrepresented or excluded from agreements entered into between companies and workers’ unions.\(^{57}\) In general, the significant presence of migrant workers within the Singaporean workforce has led to some concern in recent years, as evidenced by anti-immigration protests against the government’s white paper on population policy in 2013.\(^{58}\) Although there are few reported incidences of conflicts between migrant workers and local residents, negative reactions to the Little India riots in 2013 highlighted underlying attitudes towards certain nationalities of workers.\(^{59}\)

Migrant Domestic Workers

Migrant domestic workers are only permitted to work and live at the location designated on their work permit, and employers have a corresponding duty to provide sufficient accommodation for their worker.\(^{60}\) Due to the live-in requirement and lack of legal provisions on maximum working hours, domestic workers – who are specifically excluded from the Employment Act – may work in excess of 16 hours per day, seven days a week.\(^{61}\) Only in 2012 did the Ministry of Manpower grant a weekly rest day in favour of migrant domestic workers; however, this was limited only to new contracts commencing in January 2013.\(^{62}\)

Due to the live-in requirement, migrant domestic workers are vulnerable not only to labour exploitation, but also verbal, physical and sexual abuse.\(^{63}\) Communications and movement may be limited by employers, who may require their domestic worker to stay at home. Claims against employers may take several months or years, during which migrant domestic workers are not allowed to seek employment.\(^{64}\) Further, general difficulties with enforcing the law within private homes mean that domestic workers are required to work or sleep in unsatisfactory conditions. Migrant domestic workers have been noted to be particularly susceptible to agency malpractices, as a significant portion are engaged through recruiters or employment agencies which may not be well regulated in their country of origin.

Responses

The Singaporean government has pledged to take action to ameliorate some of the issues mentioned above.

With regards to protecting migrant workers in employment, the Ministry of Manpower committed to make mandatory the provision of itemised payslips to workers, detailing figures for salary, total allowance, deductions and terms of employment by 2016.\textsuperscript{65}

In relation to migrant domestic workers, mandatory orientation programs and stringent regulation of employment agencies and employers have been introduced.\textsuperscript{66} However, there has been no action to include domestic workers within the Employment Act, or to extend protections in line with the ILO’s Convention No. 189 on Decent Work for Domestic Workers.
